Reading Comprehension (25 points)

Question Number One: (15 points)

Read the text and do the tasks below:

The term global village was first popularized by the Canadian writer Marshall McLuhan in the early 1960s. He described how communications technology was transforming the world into something more like a village, in which people could communicate and pass on information quickly and easily. And this, remember, was many years before the Internet was widely used.

The word globalisation is also older than most people think. It appeared, with more or less the same meaning as it has today, as early as the 1940s. It is true, though, that it wasn't until the second half of the 1980s that it became common, at first in the area of economics and business, and then in other academic fields. By the 1990s, it seemed as if everyone was talking about it.

We may now have reached a point when it is so much a part of our lives that we no longer think about it very much. If you tell a group of young business students that they're going to discuss globalisation, the chances are that they won't see the point. Far from being a new idea, it now simply describes the way things are.

A. Answer the following questions:

For people who have few other outlets, online networking sites can be a valuable tool to stay connected to others and to keep in touch with fellow human beings. That's a good thing! In our online world just as in our offline world, we can form many different levels of friendship and have an endless number of acquaintances (people you know little about).

Of my own online social networking friends, only a small percentage are people I've met personally. Among those I've never met, there are a few who I consider real friends anyway, in that we've shared interests and phone calls outside of the social networking site and created a bond.

The Internet is simply one more way to make friends and acquaintances and it can be disappointing or misleading. I don't really fault online networking sites for being what they are. From my point of view, they are useful tools for connecting people to each other when used as a supplement to everyday living. They cannot replace human contact.
